Battery safety buenos aires

Quick Answer: Although a generally safe city (as well as for the country too), Buenos Aires does have its unsafe areas. These mostly included the shanty towns near Retiro, however you'll also want to be careful in the popular touristy area of La Boca (especially at night).

Aside from these, Buenos Aires overall is pretty safe to visit. You'll feel this especially if coming south from Brazil, where the cities here often feel overwhelmingly big and can be pretty unsafe in various barrios.

You'll still want to follow our usual safety tips which include keeping your phone in your front pocket, as well as not walking into unknown neighborhoods or areas at night by yourself.

Those on a frugal backpacking budget will want to stay at the Mons Hostel. Here you'll have your own deluxe dorm bed (with curtains and a sealed-off pod for privacy), as well as being located in the heart of the Recoleta district.

If you're looking for a more deluxe accommodation, then we suggest staying at the Hostel Sweet Home Palermo Soho. Here you'll have your own private room, as well as having an on-site restaurant to enjoy for convenience. You'll also be staying within the classy neighborhood of Palermo too.

Not only is the Argentinian capital really easy to access, it's also home to a range of incredible attractions – making it the perfect place to kick off a journey through this portion of South America.

Among the many famous landmarks here we can firstly visit the Obelisk statue which is an iconic monument, as well as other architectural delights such as the Cabildo, Casa Rosada and Metropolitan Cathedral. It's also worth visiting La Recoleta Cemetery, which is a maze of large burial temples and has many famous and important figures buried here.

Buenos Aires also has a really distinct culture too. La Boca is a great neighborhood to see classic life in Buenos Aires, along with rows upon rows of brightly coloured buildings. You'll also find many novel experiences to have in the capital, including going on a food tour, dancing Tango as well as watching a heated local football match.

Recently there has been an increase of muggings and robberies, especially in and around La Boca neighborhood (which is a popular district for tourism) – so be careful when coming here especially at night.

As previously mentioned, crime is on the rise here in Buenos Aires. You will of course still find many safe areas to stay in and explore (such as Recoleta and Palermo), however you'll still want to keep your guard raised.

Much of the crime is related to opportunistic criminals, who act out of desperation more than anything else (given the economic situation in Argentina is getting worse). For this reason it is essential to avoid making yourself a target – which includes not dressing up extra fancy unless taking cabs to get around, and also not walking with your phone out in your hand.

In popular districts like Palermo you can walk around freely and feel pretty safe during the day. This is because these areas cater to tourism, and also have a heightened police presence. This is also the same in and around the neighborhood of Recoleta.
