But Tajikistan needs help from the World Bank and other international partners to ensure that the Rogun HPP becomes economically viable, addresses environmental and social issues, and operates transparently. Partners' support in financing the project can keep it from tying up too much of the government's budget, diverting resources from economic development and critical services like health and education. This support can also lower the country's risk of debt distress, which could jeopardize its growth potential.

As a first step, the World Bank and Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank have funded technical assistance to help set up the project's financing framework, build government capacity to manage the project, strengthen dam safety and other technical aspects of construction, and plan for environmental and social risks--as well as the ways that the project's revenues can benefit Tajikistan's people.
